【6】 次の英文を読んで、後の設問に答えよ。(30点)

Many Japanese people are interested in making friends with Americans. However, they often find this difficult. The language barrier is one difficulty, but there are other problems, such as knowing which subjects to talk about and which subjects to avoid. It may also be difficult to know (a) how to keep a conversation going.

There are a number of possible subjects you can talk with Americans about. Americans talk about their work if they are employed, their classes and majors if they are students, their families, their leisure time activities, and sports, among other topics. You can ask, "What kind of work do you do?" or "Where do you work?" If the other person is a student, you can ask, "What classes are you taking?" and "What is your major?" You can ask about their plans for an upcoming holiday, or what they did the previous weekend. (b) you get to know another person a little better, you can ask whether the other person is married and has children. You should also be prepared to answer questions like these in a conversation. For example, you should be able to talk briefly about the type of work you do and how you like it. Also, it is helpful to be able to talk in English about Japan and Japanese culture.

When you ask questions in a conversation, don't skip around from one topic to another. If you can, (c) follow one question with a related one. For example, you might ask an American, "Where do you work?" If the American says, "At Mercy Hospital," don't follow up with a question about sports. Ask another question about their work, such as what kind of work they do or how they like it.

Sometimes it is difficult to keep a conversation going. (d) One thing you can do is to give more information in answer to a question than is asked for. If you only say "At Mercy Hospital," in answer to a question about where you work, it does not help keep the conversation moving. Give more information, such as exactly what your job is.

Also, a good conversation is a two-way conversation. Both people ask and answer questions. If one person asks all the questions, it is more like an interview than a conversation. The person who is asking all of the questions may feel that the other person is not really interested in the conversation. Therefore, you should both ask questions and answer them.

There are some topics that you should avoid, especially when you first meet people. One potentially sensitive topic is money. (e) an American might tell you how much he paid for something or what his salary is, it is usually not polite for you to ask.
